The only constant in life is change—and for credit union managers, that includes interest rates. A sustainable balance between what they pay and charge for funds is essential, and a volatile rate environment can make that balance difficult to strike.

For U.S. credit unions, year-over-year loan growth in the third quarter was 2.5% and share growth was 3.2%. Meanwhile, TruStage calls for 6% growth in 2025 in both those crucial categories.

Of course, those results depend on interest rate movement and the economy. The Fed continued lowering its benchmark rate in December but signaled a slowdown in rate decreases in the year to come, barring unforeseen changes. With all of that in mind, five credit union decision-makers offer their thoughts on 2025.
